President Clinton visits LAVC

Clinton focuses on job training

By DANA MEADOR
News Editor

"They (Republicans), had their way for 12 years," Clinton said during his speech at Los Angeles Valley College On Tuesday, May 18, 1993. "I want the citizens to support my economic program: support efforts to bring the deficit down, cut spending get the wealthy to pay their fair taxes, invest in education, job training and give people incentives for new jobs," he added.

The White House Press Release stated that after a decade of social and economic downfalls, the Clinton Administration recently introduced the Economic Empowerment Act of 1993, which will begin a new era of opportunity and give more responsibility to the community and all Americans. This incentive gives local communities flexibility to work with the private sector to develop economic strategies that will generate small business, start new jobs and evoke people to get ahead.

Clinton was greeted with applause as he discussed his economic plans for the nation and California's economy. One of the many efforts he outlined was that of people taking responsibility for their futures, learning new skills and making decisions that would give them better job security.

Clinton briefly described why the economy is facing such an enormous deficit. "By running over $300 billion in the red every year, our debt has gone from one to four trillion," he said. "By cutting taxes and increasing spending, people had more money in their pockets."he added.

The plan that Clinton sees in the making is one that will, "bring the deficit down, give us control over the budget and your future," he said. With ever-increasing programs, it is hard to tell which programs will benefit and which ones will be dead in the water.

Clinton said that "more money should be spent on programs like this, because you could have the best economic policies in the world, but if the people's training doesn't equal the jobs in a global economy, good economic policies don't put people to work." he added.

As the community waits for reassurance, Clinton's program will consist of training skilled workers. This will allow for those workers to keep higher paying positions and to touch bases with many communities to find out what they are facing and how they can be helped.

These troubled times in the nation's economy filters in and also affects the state and local levels of government. This lack of a stable education program and job security ties the hands of the government and holds the future of today's students and skilled workers hostage.

"I would like to hear that Clinton is increasing the budget for the nursing program," said Ady P. Abarro, a nursing student from LAVC. "There's about 350 names on waiting lists to get into school next year," she added.

As the economy continues to dawn the face of uncertainty, many people have to consider changing to other means of work. Several people have heard this wake-up call and have tried to learn other vocations so they would not be left in the perpetual darkness of the economy. "Nursing is a skilled profession, but no one considers it as one," said Abarro.

Another nursing student, Eva Soomro, who is in her second year feels the increase in fees is too high, but is still willing to pay the proposed $30 fee. "Books are costly and many students may not have the opportunity to go to college," said Soomro.

The steps taken today through approaches ranging from job training, federal tax credits to the creation of new jobs, will stimulate the economic growth for a brighter tomorrow. That same future may become bleak if Republican's opposed to Clinton's incentives have their way.

"Investments must be made in people, technology and jobs," Clinton said. "This is a time to make tough decisions, if we're going to compete with other countries and that you, (LAVC) really are on the cutting edge of that change," he added.

The deficit appears to be holding its own against any attempt to subside its harsh effects. "I asked the Secretary of Commerce Ron Brown to head a team in my Administration to develop a specific strategy to try make sure we were doing everything we could do to help turn this economy around," Clinton said.

"It's great that he's talking to people," said Michael Wilson, a teacher from Taft High School. It's a problem when straight "A" students which are accepted to Stanford, can't go because of money," Wilson said.

The students in Wilson's presence were a part of the 1993 United States Academic Decathlon. They wore t-shirts that held a rainbow of people to celebrate diversity and to show that all people are affected by this deficit.

"There should be a University of America, all over America," Wilson said. "Every child should be able to go college that wants to. Right now, we're in a cycle that is self perpetual — only the elite can go to major colleges and are the only ones able to get the jobs when they get out," he added.

All forms of government must work together to straighten out the problems of the past and have a brighter road for tomorrow. "There's nothing a president, nothing a mayor, nothing anybody can do for you, that you're not prepared to do for yourself. It's got to be a partnership and a two-way street," Clinton said.

President vows Woo support

By SARY FORNARIS
Editor-in-Chief

While on a "presidential campaign wagon" type tour of California, President Bill Clinton took the opportunity to reiterate his endorsement of City Councilman Michael Woo for Los Angeles Mayor during his visit to Los Angeles Valley College.

The President and Woo spoke to reporters after Clinton's question-and-answer session with a representative group of students of LAVC.

Clinton, who had made his official endorsement on May 15, said in more than one occasion his "unusual" move was based on his knowledge of Woo's position. He said he had nothing against Richard Riordan, Woo's opponent.

"I am here to tell you why I endorse Michael Woo," Clinton said during the brief impromptu press conference,"I endorse Michael Woo not because I have something against his opponent but because I know how (Woo) thinks... because of what he said to me in private."

The President said, he and Woo had discussed the councilman's plans to bring the community together after the Los Angeles riot in April 1992, as well as his agenda to help improve the city's economy. Clinton also said Woo supports the Presidents educational and economic plans including his National Service program and his Empowerment Act.

The Empowerment Act was introduced by Clinton earlier this year as a new approach to solve the economic problems in distressed communities. This program will use not only the traditional tax breaks to businesses to revitalize the economy, but it will also offer capital incentives to encourage private sector investment; tax credits for employer contributions (penalty-free withdrawals for education, purchase of first home, etc.) and it will also offer employment and training credits and zone priority invesments (Community Partnerships Against Crime, up to 30 Enterprise School Communities, etc.)

"It is a 100 percent just my feelings," said Clinton. "I have nothing against his opponent." Clinton said that Woo had endorsed his presidential candidacy before the New Hampshire primaries, so this was not a "political payback". The President pointed out "There is a sense of loyalty," but he would not endorse Woo if he thought the councilman was not fit for the job.

Group calls for LACCD inquiry

By ANDREW SAMUELSON
Editor-In-Chief

Citing alleged mishandling of tax payers money, a consumer group petitioned the Los Angeles County grand jury to investigate the Los Angeles Community College District, (which includes Los Angeles Valley College) last Thursday.

The Concerned Citizens of Los Angeles filed the complaint written by spokesman Gene Waldman and real estate developer Mark Gendron because of the districts' alleged disregard for issues that were raised in the 1985-86 grand jury investigation of the LACCD.

"There is no fiscal accountability," Gendron said. "No one's watching them, so they think they can get away with it."

The recommendations that were made to the LACCD in the 1985-86 grand jury investigation were in regards to lack of long range strategic direction, absence of fiscal accountability and responsibility, ineffective organizational structure and escalating legal costs.

Waldman claimed that the recommendations concerning these issues have been blatantly disregarded by the LACCD.

Besides these alleged problems, another issue which has caused a split amongst the LACCD's Board of Trustees and is a concern of the Concerned Citizens of Los Angeles is the debate over which building should be used as headquarters for the LACCD.

In 1990, the district borrowed $17.5 million from the Capitol Guarantee Insurance Company with the intention of relocating its headquarters. The loan was refinanced to be paid back in a 30 year time frame including rent for 20 years and interest accumulated in the last ten years, according to Waldman.

With the money, the LACCD purchased a nine-story building on 4050 Wilshire Blvd. for $12.5 million in December, 1990, with the intention of using it as its headquarters, moving from its office on 617 W. Seventh Street. An additional $3 million was allocated to renovate the building, make it earthquake proof and clean it for asbestos, according to Gendron.

But since this time the building has sat vacant and in December, 1992, trustees asked district officials to investigate a 20-year lease on 770 Wilshire Blvd.

An intricate part of the original deal was to lease out the ninth story of the building to generate $150,000 to $180,000 that would be spread among the nine schools that make up the LACCD. But that plan was scrapped because of unforeseen needs for space.

On March 10, the Board of Trustees approved a plan to sell the 4050 Wilshire Blvd. building and move into the 770 Wilshire Blvd. location.

The decision is said by Gendron to save the district money over a short time period but in the long run will cost taxpayers.

The plan to move into the 770 Wilshire building includes a 12-year lease agreement with an option for an eight year renewal. The district will not have to pay rent for the first two years of the agreement, but payment will begin in the third year with moderate increases beginning thereafter until the eleventh and twelfth years when the bulk sum will be expected to be paid.

To avoid the added payments, the LACCD can enter the eight year option in its lease.

In a March 11, 1993, Daily News article, Board President, Wallace Knox defended the new lease saying it would save the district $1 million a year.

"This is one member of the board who pledges to pour every dollar of that million to keeping our campuses open," Knox said in the article. "That was the sole purpose of the move into a leased building."

But Gendron said the long term cost over a 60 year time frame could cost the district between $50 million and $60 million.

The complaint filed for a grand jury investigation will be decided within the next couple weeks according to Waldman.

If the complaint is denied, Gendron said that he will continue pressuring the LACCD, until the necessary changes are made.

ASU approves $73,000 budget

By JOSE LEMUS
Staff Writer

Immediately after President Clinton waved good-bye to Valley College yesterday, the executive council of the Associated Students Union went back to the mundane business of hammering out its operating budget for the 1993-94 school year.

In its last official meeting of the semester, the outgoing council voted to approve the $73,000 budget that will help fund various student services on campus for next year.

The passage of the budget was a great relief to the council, which adjourned the meeting with a loud cheer in celebration of the closure of another chapter in student government activities.

After the meeting, Commissioner of Jewish Affairs David Kornblatt expressed his relief with the approval of the budget. "It looked like it was never going to be done," he said. "We worked on it for six hours."

Kornblatt had helped in drafting the budget before it suffered minor changes at the council meeting.

As part of the changes, the council voted to allocate $700 to help fund the LAVC Orchestra, remove a $250 college president food allocation, decrease the cheer leaders' allocation from $900 to $800, augment the radio station's allocation from $600 to $900, and reduce the $1,200 originally proposed for the television station to $900. The detailed budget can be obtained by request at the ASU office.

In closing the meeting, outgoing President Hernandez and Vice-President Ben Padua thanked the council for working hard through the year. Hernandez promised the council to come back in the fall and help with the work in the ASU. Padua will move on to other activities

The council will return in the fall semester with Don Graham as its new president.

In summarizing his work through the year Hernadez said, "It's over," and took a deep breath. "It's cool, it was fun. We spent the year fighting fee hikes and budget cuts," he said. "I don't want to leave the office."

Valley gets needed boost

Los Angeles Valley College got a much needed boost in morale yesterday with the visit from the President of the United States. The campus felt appreciated after a long spell of feeling minimized by government.

Everyone that I saw before, during, and after the visit kind of had a glow to them simply because they felt that Valley College was important for the day. Professor Farrell Broslawsky stated in his political science class Tuesday evening that he was "so proud of the students on this campus. I thought the students asked good questions, that the President was accessible, and that we actually have a chance to move ahead in this country if we fight for what we deserve.

The important thing is that the rulers who favored the wealthy in this country are out, and we have seen their successor, and there's reason to be hopeful again."

As short term as the feeling may be, we were all proud to be Valley college students this week.

Why? Because here was President Clinton here at LAVC, sitting right there under the trees between the Math Science and Engineering buildings telling us that it was alright to dream again. And sometimes that's all you have to hear to believe in the system again.

Sure, in many ways, to make too much out of Tuesday's Presidential visit is to risk perpetuating a Grand Illusion. But if all the world's a stage, we were for once at the center of the biggest spotlight. We learn in our English literature classes, in our art classes, all our classes really, that imagination is an essential component of our education, and our lives.

To put it another way, "a rose by any other name may be just as sweet..." But a President is not the same as any other President. One bombs Panama, another visits the Nazi cemetery at Bitburg and calls the soldiers "victims."

Contrarily, Clinton plans to expand health care access and ease the loan process to afford a college education. Maybe you support him or maybe you don't, but his presence here— upbeat, fiesty, forward looking, accessible— should give every LAVC that glow for quite a while.

For a day at least, we were all FOB. (Friends of Bill.)

President looks for change

As it happened in the 1930s, it was the economic crises which brought Franklin Delano Rosevelt to the White House. It was the economic crises which made people go into the streets to demand for basic change. It was that what made possible the New Deal and the Second New Deal instituted during the Rosevelt Administration. With those changes, the crises was largely alleviated.

Perhaps it is the economic crises of the '80s and '90s what made possible the election of a president for "change" like Bill Clinton to the highest office of this nation this time.

Like the New Deal and the Second New Deal in FDR's times, Clinton's programs today are intended to turn the economic crises into hope for many.

"Tax the rich" is way too radical an option for economic reforms during America's prosperous times. But it is not now for millions, and this was proven in the last November elections.

If the Clinton Administration moves to invest "on people, technology and jobs" as the President told the cheering crowd at LAVC yesterday, then, there will be real change in America.

The American people, in general need to realize the meaning of these crucial times. A president of "change" does not appear at every moment in history. In American politics it happens only during special times. This is a special time. It is a time to put people back to work, to incentive young and old to go back to school, and those who are already in to keep in.

It is a time to fund a healthcare system that will guarantee coverage to every person living in America and who contributes to the economy. It is a time to help everyone in need. That is why it is a time to support the President.

However, we recognize that Clinton's plans for the recovery of the country's economic disarray have flaws.

For instance the National Service program that offers up to $5,000 award per year to students to pay back in the form of community service is a beginning. But why not a fully funded federal grants program to guarantee education for all those who want one?

We recognize the President's programs need improvement in some areas, however we urge every student and the college community in general to support them because it is the best we have on hand.

Everyone loves power

By EVA R. YELLOZ

BOB LA CATTIVA / Valley Star

Everyone loves power. People gather in the thousands to be close to power. To get even remotely near power, they stand in the rain, they freeze in the snow and they swelter and wilt in the heat.

Yesterday, at the Los Angeles Valley College campus, thousands of students, faculty, staff and area residents gathered beneath blue skies, in fair weather, and waited for more than an hour to catch a glimpse of President William Jefferson Clinton. The throngs of people were diverse.

Some faculty were dressed as usual in their Docker slacks and cotton plaid shirts. Some women wore conservative tailored suits and low heels while another woman wore a snappy red linen two-piece double-breasted number with a gold and black crest on the breast pocket.

Many others wore summery flowered dresses and strappy sandals. Some men looked like they were ready to be interviewed for a White House position and stood in line wearing their finest blue suits, crisply starched shirts and most conservative ties. Students came as they usually do in "everything goes" clothes typical of American campuses.

Clinton's California trip was a combination of good-will gestures, political back-patting, and a dose of mayoral endorsing. People who packed walkways adjacent to the small wooden platform set up in a shady, tree-lined clearing between the Engineering and Math-Science buildings practically melted into the pavement and were pressed together a little harder than Mr. Whipple squeezed his Charmin.

All this discomfort just to get a birds's eye view of a president. To any observer, it would seem Clinton was in a friendly camp and on calm waters. Wrong. Being ensconced in the masses proved to be an experience similar to that of a fly on the wall. Hearing bits and pieces of conversations from students and other observers was somewhat disconcerting. Clinton lovers were scarce in the area where I stood.

The only disturbing part of an otherwise monumental day was having two hecklers on either side of me. From the moment I began the waiting game at 10:15 a.m., I felt their presence beside me. It began with shoving and elbowing and the constant exchange of snide remarks between them about the president and his policies. The hecklers whispered the intended jeers they would yell out during the president's talk.

Finally, almost an hour later, we were pushed forward toward the newly set up metal detectors. The way people fought to get to the front of the line, was as if their favorite actor or singer was about to appear on stage. Campus police and secret service handled security like champions. There weren't any notable incidents other than your garden-variety of peaceful demonstrators with a plethora of causes inscribed on cardboard placards attached to wooden sticks.

My group lunged forward and got front line place between the walkway, a wax-leaf privet bush and an ornamental fig tree. We innocently trampled dozens lilies, while a few Clinton-watchers cleared the privet to get a better view. But just like waiting for the doctor, first in the reception area and then in the examining room, there was more anticipation and anxieties were created. People were sweating, a student fainted and was immediately tended to by fire department paramedics. Every third or fourth person said that if he "Clinton" didn't come soon, they would try and get out of the crowd. Some said that the waiting was ridiculous and they didn't think it was worth it. I overheard a woman in her 30s saying she never waits on lines "not for a restaurant, a movie, or anything" but she stayed. People were hooked.

Suddenly a hush in the crowd. A woman listening to KFWB radio heard that the presidential entourage was coming up the Sepulveda Pass. She shared the news with everyone in earshot. People were disappointed, that meant another 20 minute wait, at least. There were expletives uttered left and right. But the people remained.

One woman beside me said "This reminds me of once going to Disneyland on a July 4. I only got to go on four rides." But the woman, Martha Perez, a counselor, smiled and remained cool waiting for her ride on May 18.

Finally, clapping and screaming, shorter people stood on tip-toes and tall ones smiled because of their height advantage and because they got what they came for. Bill Clinton came forward and sat himself down on a simple stool placed on a makeshift wooden platform. The press, photographers and cameramen took their places and began filming history's footage a few hundred feet off the corners of Burbank Boulevard and Fulton Avenue in Van Nuys.

The excitement was infectious. Suddenly many of the students who cursed, sweated and threatened to leave, beamed! They were entranced by their president's charisma. I don't think they heard his words or the questions he was asked and how he answered them. It was the man! They were caught up in the electricity of the event. The heat, the waiting, it didn't matter. He was here now and they could see him. Their gripes temporarily disappeared.

But then the two hecklers, one was about 5 feet, 9 inches and stocky with straight brown hair and sharp blue eyes and the other was taller, maybe six feet, blond-haired, blue-eyed and cock-sure of himself began the business they came for. They gave each other a sign and unraveled white posterboards scrawled with marker. They said "You broke your promise!" when Clinton spoke about education and student loans. They yelled out "No more taxes!" when a student asked if she could realize her dream and purchase a house. Although Clinton's back faced us, he clearly heard the hecklers and answered them with his usual aplomb.

The hecklers bothered me and many of the people surrounding them. But they got their moment of fame. The secret service man facing us spoke into his watch-radio, describing the hecklers to his associates behind the bushes. Within seconds, two bulky men in tweed coats plucked the loud-mouths out. Then, President Clinton made a turn-around and came to greet the crowd I stood with. Hands stretched out while everyone who could vied for the chief executive's touch.

The hecklers were checked out and returned to our midst. A reporter came forward and asked the heavy-set fellow in the red shirt who he was with. He said he was on his own. But between his jeers and the loud-mouthing he exchanged with his tall partner, he claimed to be a Republican from the Riordan camp trying to discredit Clinton's endorsement of Michael Woo for Mayor. As far as I'm concerned, they made asses of themselves.

Even though I'm not one for crowds, have never asked for an autograph in my life and don't go to rallies, I must admit seeing Bill Clinton on my campus today was a momentous occasion. I offered my hand and it was received with a strong and earnest grip. It was a great feeling for the "lady in red."

When I was a little girl my father taught me to give a firm shake. He said you can judge a man by how he greets you when he takes your hand in his. He also said you shouldn't rely on a man whose shake is limp.

Bill, come through for us. I like to believe my father's old adages.

Students meet with Clinton

By AMANDA L. DUCHOW
Staff Writer

President Bill Clinton's visit to Los Angeles Valley College was met with excitement and anticipation by students and staff. Fifty handpicked Valley students made their own preparations.

ASU members who attended were titillated by the opportunity to let the President know the economic plight of education in this country.

"It is a great honor to have the President at LAVC. It is a positive change to be recognized for excellent educational standards," said ASU President Jesse Hernandez. "The president's visit will show the California Community college in a positive light."

As preparations began early Tuesday morning, classroom changes, parking lot closures and security checkpoints added to the excitement of those students who were invited guests.

Upon his arrival, and before speaking to students, staff, press and state and city representatives, Clinton toured the engineering department. There, he discussed his economic policies.

After a brief speech, the President took questions from the group of students. One of the most pointed questions was asked by ASU secretary Tamara Smith.

Smith asked, "There are many different claims of how much your economic plan will increase middle income taxes. Can you tell us, in very simple, non-political language, how much more money middle class, those making less than $60,000 a year will pay in taxes?" The President responded to Smith with a direct answer concerning his proposed energy tax (BTU tax).

Smith said that she was satisfied with his answer and "honored" to ask the President a question, and "felt just a bit overwhelmed." The President even surprised Smith by returning a few minutes later to ask her a question. "It's not as bad as they make it seem, is it?" asked the President.

Over all, the ASU and the students were pleased with the President's visit and hoped he would remember LAVC and the dilemma facing California's college system.

Students 'capture the flag'

By BILL McBRIDE
Staff Writer

After a long week of school or work, there are a couple of ways to unwind. Parties and beaches are relaxing, but for almost a decade now people have been shooting each other for a weekend activity. Men and women from all walks of life gather at fields and arenas to play one of the fastest-growing sports—paintball.

Millions of people assemble at paintball fields in over two-dozen countries to participate in a collective rush of adrenalin.

"It's a safe way to get in touch with nature and great exercise at the same time," said Yani Searles, Commissioner of Public Relations for LAVC's recently-formed Paintball Club.

There are various formats of paintball games, including "Search for the Documents" and "Predator," but the most common is "Capture the Flag." In this version, anywhere from five to 500 players on a team try to capture the other team's flag, and at the same time protect their own. With this goal in mind, players attempt to eliminate opponents by shooting them with a paintball. Games typically last from 20 to 45 minutes and afterwards players gather to swap war stories and prepare for the next game.

The paintballs are small capsules filled with colored liquid that rinse off of body parts and clothes with soap and water. In keeping with the theme of a sport that can be enjoyed in nature, the pellets are non-toxic, non-caustic, water-soluble and biodegradable.

Safety has always been an issue with paintball, but the record speaks for itself. National Safety Council statistics show paintball as the safest sport out there, with injuries being about half that of bowling and about a third that of golf. Playing-field operators explain the rules to participants and referees supervise the games to insure safe play and a good time. Goggles are required for all players and camouflage is optional.

This semester is the first that LAVC has had a paintball club and it seems to be catching on. With a five dollar membership fee, students can get group discounts at fields and supply stores. In addition, meetings of the Paintball Club are held every week to discuss where to play and strategies. Searles hopes that paintball will eventually become an intercollegiate activity and someday an Olympic sport.

"There is even an all-girl team called P.M.S., Paint Men Silly," said Searles. "Age and sex don't matter. Everyone has goggles and camouflage on so you can't even tell if you're shooting a guy or a girl sometimes," he said.

First and foremost, paintball is a team effort; all players must look out for each other or be "tagged."

In any case, it would be nice if warring countries could take the comraderie and safety of paintball to the battlefield and return with the physical workout and tales of adventure.

Clinton said it will be the voters decision and they should "vote on the merits of the candidate," but that "It will be a whole better if we have someone with whom we can work."

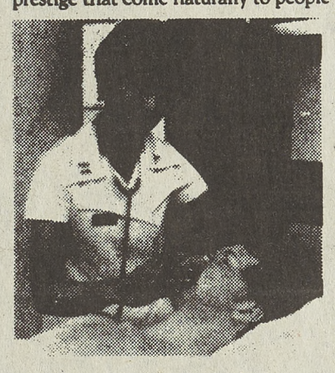
Woo said "President Clinton's endorsement says this is a very special election." With his plan, Woo intends to "clean up 12 years of trickle down economics" and give a chance to everyone to thrive. It is an opportunity "to establish a strong partnership between the White House and Los Angeles," Woo said.

Farrel R. Broslawsky, political science and history professor at LAVC, said he doubts Clinton's endorsement will be of much help for Woo. "I think this is probably going to be a wash." "Woo wants to unify the community but he is running a very bad campaign. He is running an anti-Riordan campaign." "Riordan's campaign, on the other hand, is very divisive. He has a good chance to win but he will never win LA."

Broslawsky said Woo "is being advised very poorly. In Los Angeles we are not really Democrats. We vote for what we perceive it would be the best interest."

IN THE ARMY, YOU'LL TAKE CHARGE IN MORE WAYS THAN ONE.

There's an added dimension to being a nurse in the Army. You'll have increased health care responsibilities. And you'll enjoy the respect and prestige that come naturally to people who serve as officers in the Army Nurse Corps.



You'll be a respected member of an exceptional health care team. Your opinion and counsel will be actively sought and listened to. And you'll have the opportunity to practice nursing in a variety of environments, from high-tech military hospitals to MASH units, from flight lines to field hospitals, in the United States or overseas.

Here are some of the reasons to consider becoming an Army Nurse: good pay and benefits, opportunities for continuing education in your chosen specialty, seniority that moves with you when you do, and job experience you can't put a price tag on.

Discover the Army Nurse Corps difference. Talk to an Army Nurse Recruiter today.
